 [During my third year in law school I was the law review editor who finalized the publication of this massive data-based court study organized by students who graduated a year before me. I made a number of content changes and added a collection of new data tabulations. The data additions were framed to more fully reveal the enormous scale of racism revealed by the study. I also drafted an “editorial” about my findings and encouraged the editorial board on which I sat to publish it as a preface to the study itself. The board agreed. The journal’s student editors therefore took the rare step of editorializing about an article it published. See Editorial Note, 35 U. CHI. L. REV. 256 (1968). To this day I am proud of the board’s willingness to take that step during a prior epoch when race issues were garnering national headlines. Web Sites and Videos:

Part of my career at Georgetown University Law Center is memorialized by two web pages and a video:

The Javins Project Web Site: I built the original version of this web site as a companion to the Javins (a.k.a. Saunders) article published in GEO. J. ON POVERTY L. & POLICY in 2004. The site contains additional information on the case, copies of all the court documents in the litigation from both the District of Columbia and federal courts, and pictures of the apartment complex involved in the dispute. The site now is maintained by the Georgetown University Law Library, which provided invaluable assistance in gathering many of the documents I used in writing the article. The Javins Project may be found at: <https://repository.library.georgetown.edu/handle/10822/1051083>.

Gender and Legal History Paper Project: While at Georgetown I taught a seminar in Gender and Law in American History with Professor (now Emerita) Wendy Williams. Many of the papers written by students in that course are in the Georgetown University Law Library. Access to them may be obtained at another web page I left behind. See: <https://repository.library.georgetown.edu/handle/10822/1051094>.

Gay Rights Coalition Case Oral History Project: In 1979 the Gay Rights Coalition applied to be recognized as a student organization at Georgetown University Law Center. When that petition, as well as one pursued by a related student group on the main campus of the university, was denied, a law suit was filed challenging the legitimacy of the decision under the human rights ordinance of the District of Columbia. With the permission of the students, I and two other members of the law school faculty, joined the case as plaintiffs. An oral history video about my participation in the case may be found at: <https://repository.library.georgetown.edu/handle/10822/1041389>.
